Capitol Comments
By Dan Daniel

WASHINGTON - "Crisis" is a word in danger of losing its meaning through overuse. We are now many years into our energy crisis. Also for many years, we have been told of the urban crisis. A water supply crisis erupted nationwide this year. And doubtless any day now, when you pick up the paper or turn on the evening news, yet another crisis will confront you. Except for brief periods when imminent shortage becomes a reality, crisis is really not the appropriate word. These are not crises, they are both problems and challenges. Accordingly, they are problems for which solutions exist, once we make up our minds to look for them.

There is one area however where crisis is by no means too strong a word to use. It is an intangible, and because it cannot be touched, smelled, heard, seen, or tasted, it is growing unreported. But it is growing. And if it is not widely acknowledged and acted on soon, we will all wake up one morning in a world we do not want, and wondering how we got there.

It is a crisis of confidence.

Now without getting too philosophical about the thing, a loss of confidence is almost always a direct result of disappointment in those people and institutions in which we once had faith, only to find that they have let us down. And this feeling of disappointment has manifested itself in many areas.

It is stating the obvious to say that people have lost confidence in the government. That loss can be demonstrated in any number of examples, and many of them have been outlined in prior messages. It is a loss that sometimes seems beyond recapture, and in hindsight - which is always better than foresight - it might have been anticipated. Each of us is an individual, and we are justifiably proud that we are unique, not like any other. And we are frustrated with a government which insists on seeing us as a cipher - just one of a group or category.

We have already, in a previous statement, explored the question of the government's having lost confidence in the American people. This is a very bad thing, but this, and the loss of faith by people in the government, can both be corrected. Our Constitution provides the means of change within the government, and in times past this means has been employed.

But there is another area where faith has been lost, and for this the remedy cannot be found in the ballot box.

It is a breakdown in belief in those things which should not be the business of government. There is a phrase for it, often overused and sometimes misunderstood - the private sector.

The private sector. What does it mean? Some politicians employ it in a manner which leaves the impression it is something evil, something not to be trusted. The government must act because "the private sector" has not. The government must provide, because "the private sector" does not. The government must intervene because "the private sector" will not. Terrible, isn't it? This "private sector" must be a real villian - something out of a science fiction movie.

Where does this distrust, a distrust almost bordering on fear come from? I wish I had the answer. There would be comfrot to be derived from pointing a finger to a person, an institution.

Yet what is the private sector? It is, for most of the people in this country, the source of employment. And if it is not the source of employment, it is the source of revenues, through taxes, which supports the other jobs.

For the plain truth is, you are the private sector. You work for a paycheck, you put your children through school, you make purchases, contract debts pay taxes, invest in a retirement plan, maybe buy a few shares of stock, put some money in a savings account. And after all that, maybe you buy a fishing pole and go off somewhere to get away from it all.

You are Labor (paycheck) Consumer (buyer of goods and services), Investor (savings and retiremens plan, contributor), Capitalist (investor), and a part of the Leisure Class (unless you sell those fish you catch - and then you are an entrepreneur).

The choice - right now - is yours.
